

Evidence of Elite Manipulation Through Geoengineering and Energy Weapons?

Sixbert SANGWA • October 02, 2024

In the midst of advancing technologies and a rapidly changing world, there is growing concern that the powerful elites—those in control of governments, corporations, and financial institutions—are using covert technologies to manipulate global events. Energy weapons, geoengineering, and weather manipulation programs like HAARP have sparked debate and fear, particularly when they are linked to unexplained natural disasters. These technologies, often hidden from public view, may be serving a greater purpose: preparing the world for a New World Order and the rise of a global government under the Antichrist, as foretold in biblical prophecy. By attributing disasters and climate anomalies to climate change, these elites divert attention from their true agenda, positioning themselves as the saviors of a world they are actively destabilizing.

Energy weapons, such as directed energy weapons (DEWs), use focused energy like lasers, microwaves, and electromagnetic pulses to cause destruction. These tools have been developed for military applications, but their potential covert use to manipulate natural disasters has led many to believe they are now being tested on civilian populations. Alford (2021) highlights the rise of these technologies and the difficulty in detecting their use, making them perfect tools for covert warfare (Alford, 2021). Wildfires, hurricanes, and other extreme events could be artificially created or worsened, but their origin disguised, allowing elites to blame climate change and thereby push their globalist agenda.

Another concerning technological development is geoengineering—the deliberate manipulation of Earth's natural systems. Projects like HAARP (High-frequency Active Auroral Research Program), originally designed to study the ionosphere, have long been suspected of being used for weather manipulation. Critics like Chossudovsky (2022) argue that the military has been experimenting with weather modification for years, possibly to control climates or create disasters for strategic purposes. This potential weaponization of the weather aligns with reports of increasingly strange and destructive natural events.

However, the Bible tells us that God, in His sovereignty, designed the earth to sustain itself. Natural cycles of weather are divinely regulated, and catastrophic global shifts like those blamed on climate change are inconsistent with God's creation (Genesis 8:22). Weather systems naturally restore themselves, and disasters of this magnitude—like fires, droughts, and floods—did not happen on this scale in the past. The Bible tells us that the earth will respond to human sin and rebellion, but these extreme weather events are aligned more closely with the unfolding of biblical prophecy than with man-made climate change.

The narrative of climate change has become a central theme in global discourse. World leaders and elites frequently speak of the urgent need to combat this supposed threat. However, evidence points to the possibility that many of these so-called “natural disasters” could actually be engineered by energy weapons and geoengineering technologies. The Hawaii wildfires of 2023, for example, show signs of unnatural causes. Witnesses reported seeing strange flashes of light before the fires started, raising suspicions that directed energy weapons may have been used to ignite the flames (Mackey, 2023).

The push to link these disasters to climate change serves a dual purpose: it creates fear and panic, allowing governments to tighten control over populations while also advancing a New World Order. As Smith (2024) discusses, geoengineering policies are being quietly woven into global strategies to combat climate change, but the true extent of their influence remains concealed. By instilling fear of an environmental catastrophe, elites position themselves as the architects of a new, centralized global government that claims to solve these crises. But as Christians, we must recognize that these crises are being deliberately engineered as part of a larger plan.

The New World Order is not a new concept. Throughout history, there have been attempts to unite nations under one governing body. In recent years, this push has intensified, with global leaders advocating for one-world government to solve global issues, including climate change, pandemics, and economic instability. This globalist agenda aligns with biblical prophecy, particularly the rise of a global government under the Antichrist during the end times (Revelation 13:7). The Bible warns us of a time when the world will be united under a single ruler who will demand allegiance, marking the fulfillment of these end-time prophecies. In their efforts to create a one-world government, these elites are sowing chaos through manufactured crises, positioning themselves as the solution to the problems they have created. Chossudovsky (2022) points out how geoengineering and weather warfare could be used as tools of control, allowing those in power to manipulate both the environment and populations. The rise of smart cities, like those proposed after the Hawaii fires (Rumble, 2023), further suggests that the future global system will be one of surveillance and control, aligning with the prophetic warnings of a global system of control under the Antichrist.

As Christians, we must understand that what we are witnessing aligns with biblical prophecy, particularly the trumpets in the book of Revelation. Revelation 8:7 describes the first trumpet, where "hail and fire mixed with blood" are thrown to the earth, causing devastation to a third of the trees and grass. The Hawaii fires, along with other catastrophic events, seem eerily aligned with this description, suggesting that these events are not mere coincidences but part of the prophetic unfolding of God's plan.

In addition, the Bible is clear that in the end times, there will be great deception. Matthew 24:24 warns that false prophets and false messiahs will perform signs and wonders to deceive, even, if possible, the elect. The global crises we are witnessing, and the elites' push for a centralized government under the guise of solving climate change and other global issues, are part of this deception. As believers, we must be vigilant and discerning, seeking truth through the Word of God and the guidance of the Holy Spirit (John 16:13).

The use of energy weapons and geoengineering technologies, combined with the false narrative of climate change, is leading the world toward a New World Order. This agenda aligns with biblical prophecy, which warns of the rise of a global government under the Antichrist. These events—fires, floods, pandemics, and economic instability—are not natural occurrences but are being engineered to bring about a system of control. Hawaii, for example, may have been a pilot test for these technologies, and the elites are likely to intensify these efforts as we approach 2025. As Christians, we must not be deceived. The Bible warns us of the schemes of the enemy and the rise of worldly powers that seek to control and deceive (Ephesians 6:12). We are called to watch and pray, knowing that the final victory belongs to God. Even in the face of these trials, we must remember that God is in control, and His kingdom will prevail (1 Peter 5:8).
